

PREFACE.

It has been observed by Mr. Johnson, that "the difficulty of the first address is felt by every man in his communication with the world, and is considered by the author to be the greatest of all." The world, and the world's opinion, are the objects of every man's ambition, and it is the first address which he makes to the world, which should be considered, not as a mere matter of style, but as a matter of substance, which, if it respects the interests of society, might enjoy the security of posterity.

It would be easy to suppose, that the first address of a man, who is to be considered as a public man, should be a mere matter of style, and that the first address of a man, who is to be considered as a private man, should be a mere matter of substance. But the first address of a man, who is to be considered as a public man, should be a matter of substance, which, if it respects the interests of society, might enjoy the security of posterity. The first address of a man, who is to be considered as a private man, should be a matter of style, which, if it respects the interests of society, might enjoy the security of posterity. The first address of a man, who is to be considered as a public man, should be a matter of substance, which, if it respects the interests of society, might enjoy the security of posterity. The first address of a man, who is to be considered as a private man, should be a matter of style, which, if it respects the interests of society, might enjoy the security of posterity.

We have now completed the first volume of the Imperial Magazine, with which, the present has been assigned as the cover of the English Magazine, we shall finish the first volume.

In the preparation of this work, we have been favoured with a greater variety of original articles than our most extensive experience had led us to anticipate. Many of these we have obtained from some of our considerable literary correspondents in chronological and historical research in the several departments that have afforded themselves to their communications. These original communications, and the selections which we have occasionally made, we are happy to have, some given to our subscribers without a degree of satisfaction, in which we cannot reflect without feeling the most grateful sensibility. In the first, the communications of opposition we have received, and the extensive sale of the Imperial Magazine, which is perhaps unparalleled in any one particular work, the various quarters being now in the press, furnish the most agreeable proof. And we have ourselves, that our readers will consider the specimens already placed before them, as a pledge of what they may hereafter expect; and the acknowledgment of our obligations as an assurance, that nothing shall occur on the subject, in our attention to give them equal, if not increased satisfaction.

Among the hints of improvement suggested by some of our intelligent correspondents, we are happy to have, that articles calculated to support genuine literature and substantial information are those which they chiefly recommend. This we consider as an unqualified evidence in favour of their taste and judgment; and it will be both our honour and our duty to merit their views on a ground that is so much congenial with their wishes and our own.

To the development of abilities, branches of industry, and the general improvement of the human mind, we shall give particular attention; and we feel no hesitation in pledging ourselves, that
